Pittsylvania Notebook

The Empty Mill Pond

NOBODY knows who the victim of the joke was. It may have been Michael Troyer, one of the first to build a mill in the area near Berlin, in Somerset County.

The man who pulled it was Philip Wagerline, one of the first to settle in the area, and one of the famous practical jokers of the Pittsylvania Country.

Wagerline was already settled in the area when Harmon Husband came through Brothers Valley on June 5, 1771, fleeing from a death penalty for opposing tyranny in North Carolina. He mentions that the German had a large family of children, and spoke only broken English.

But later on, Wagerline's English became more fluent, and he could talk well enough to get the laugh on almost anyone. Even when serious matters were involved, he was likely to be found pulling somebody's leg.

For nearly a decade after settlers came into the area, there were no mills. The only flour to be had was by going 30 miles or more to Cumberland or Bedford, a long, slow trip for that day, over mountains and through a howling wilderness.

Wagerline wanted to interest someone in building a mill in the valley, and on one of his trips eastward for flour, he gave the millers such a glowing account of the district that the latter asked him if there were no mill sites in Brothers Valley.

"Yes," said Wagerline. "I have a good one on my own land."

"What fall would I be able to get?" asked the miller.

"Any fall you please," said Wagerline.

"I am bound to come out and see you," declared the miller, "and if you can show me such a situation, I will build you a mill."

In due time, the miller came across the mountain ridge to Wagerline's home, and was given a cordial welcome. Next day he was all agog to be taken to see the wonderful mill site.

There were plenty of good ones available in the district, but instead of taking his visitor to any of them, Wagerline took him to a dry valley, flanked by high, steep cliffs.

Pointing out a level spot, he beamed at his visitor, and asked: "Would you want a nicer place for a mill?"

The miller stood aghast for a moment. "But where is the water?" he asked.

"Water," said Wagerline, with a straight face. "You said nothing about water. All you spoke of was a situation and a fall, and here you can have all the fall you need."
